Experiments with Military Flying Machines. The Chatham correspondent of the London News, writing on the 15th ultimo, reports:-The new flying machine, the invention of Mr. Simmonds, and intended for use in military operations, was subjected to a public trial by the inventor on Chatham lines to-day, the experimental trial being attended by a large number of the officers of the Royal Engineers, among whom were Major V. G. Clayton, secretary to the Royal Engineer Committee; Capt. M. T. Sale, one of the instructors in field formi-fleations, and other heads of departments con-nected with the School of Military Engineering. prompt and careful attention. men of the Royal Engineers had been placed at the dispusal of Mr. Simonards been placed independent parts, is nothing more than a huge square-shaped, light cauvas covering, stretched or four slight but strong ash poles, or arms placed at right angles to each other, the cover ing being further attached to a center poleresembling nothing so much as the handle of an enormous umbrella-by means of light galvauiance an enorm us, : quare-shaped umbrella, the zed wires, the entire machine being in appearlargest of the two parts, or, more properly, machines, weighing about one hundred weight, and the other, which is smaller, some what less. From the extremities of each of the tour arms is attached a rope of considerable length, the four ropes being brought to a point-somewhat similar, in this respect, to a parachute-so as to support a man, the machine being intended S. E. COR. KING AND ST. ASAPH STS., for reconnoitering observations in connection with an army in the field. During the experiments to-day sand-bags were employed to represent the weight of a man. The smallest of the two machines was first tried, but wing to there being little wind it attained an elevation of but a few feet only, a number of sappers of the Royal Engineers running away with the rope to which the machine was attached, much in the same way as that adopted by children when flying their kites. After repeated at-tempts in this way Mr. Simmonds only suc ceeded in inducing the machine to rise to about twenty feet, when it would immediately fall with great force to the ground. After some time spent in these fruitless off rts, which occasioned much impatience among the spectator. it was decided, at the request of the Royal Eugineer officers present, to try to raise the largest machine as that adopted in the previous experiments was again employed, a number of men of the Royal Engineers being stationed at the end of the rope, about three hundred yards away, the machine itself being held up to face the wind by several other sappers. At a given signal trom Mr. Simmonds a run by the men was made, when the machine rose to a height of about fifty or sixty feet, and then came to the ground. A readjustment of the four guiding ropes and wires having been made, a further attempt to raise the machine was tried, but although an altitude of rather more than one hundred feet was obtained, the flying machine obstinately refused to remain in the air, but tell with a crash to the ground, breaking one of its four arm poles, and sustaining other damage. The cause of the collapse of the machine was stated by Mr. Simmonds to have been occasioned by the ballast attached to it not being of sufficient weight, and the four ropes which were connected with the ends described not being of the proper length. After a consultation it was decided to abandon any further trials on the occasion with the large machine, as some time would be required to substitute a new arm-pole for that broken, and the machine was at once stripped of its canvas covering. A second series of attempts to raise the smaller of the machines was then made. but with little or no better results than those previously achieved, and after upward of two

"To the hundreds who this week witnessed the brilliant success of Mr. Bangs in his great role of Marcus Antonius, the following page from the gifted actor's life may be of interest: When he had just taken his first steps on the high road to fame the war broke out, and he, together with many other young Washingtonians, went South and joined the Confederate army. After the fall of Rechmond he re sumed his studies, and appeared shortly on the New York stage, from which, the night of his debut, he was hissed; the following day he came out in a spirited card, saying that after diligent inquiry he had proven, satisfactorily to himself, that it was not for poor acting he had been hissed from the stage the night before, but because of his having been in the Southern army, and he thought it a v ry hard ease that a man's political sentiments should be raised as a bar to his making an honest living in the way he had marked out for himself. The papers took it up, and that innate sense of justice that distinguishes the American people told them he was right; so the next night, when he appeared, half the audience applauded while an effort was made by the other half to hiss him off again, and for a while fine con fusion prevailed, but from that day he grew steadily in favor until he reached his present high position in the theatrical world.
